

USE OF ENGLISH: OPEN CLOZE

The importance of verbalizing language

_____ (1) a teacher, I always explain that learning a language is an artform and not an exact science. It is a journey in _____ (2) the process is much more important than the end result. What it comes down to is practice and experience. Every learner needs to spend time with the language so _____ (3) to delve into the culture and truly get a feel _____ (4) the language. In this way you can start to learn from its history, its roots and _____ (5) its humour. As I have said before, to learn a language you need to practice, "practice makes perfect" _____ (6) the saying goes. It is not _____ (7) a case of reviewing the grammar rules from a textbook or having a conversation from time to time. You ought to have frequent contact with the language in order to internalise its intricate mechanisms. We call this recall. What is _____ (8), the mere act of saying words out loud as well as reading, writing and listening to it, reinforces the language and allows you to pass it from the short-term to the long-term memory.

The importance of verbalizing language

As a teacher, I always explain that learning a language is an artform and not an exact science. It is a journey in which the process is much more important than the end result. What it comes down to is practice and experience. Every learner needs to spend time with the language so as to delve into the culture and truly get a feel for the language. In this way you can start to learn from its history, its roots and even its humour. As I have said before, to learn a language you need to practice, "practice makes perfect" so the saying goes. It is not just a case of reviewing the grammar rules from a textbook or having a conversation from time to time. You ought to have frequent contact with the language in order to internalise its intricate mechanisms. We call this recall. What is more, the mere act of saying words out loud as well as reading, writing and listening to it, reinforces the language and allows you to pass it from the short-term to the long-term memory.
