Learn a language, love a culture

Languages are alive. Not _____ (1) the sense that they can walk around and think _____ (2) themselves, but in the sense that they change and grow. They are influenced _____ (3) not just people, but also places, history and cultural factors. These things influence the way we need to learn a language because, in _____ (4) humble opinion, you cannot learn a language without taking the culture or history of the language _____ (5) account. It is obvious that you need to live surrounded by a language in order _____ (6) learn it. This experience of being involved in a culture allows you to form _____ (7) emotional bond to the language, and that said, build links to the language. This way you can learn the true use of the language and not _____ (8) the theory that anyone can get from a textbook. This is why we say that book learning is out of touch with reality.

Learn a language, love a culture

Languages are alive. Not in the sense that they can walk around and think for themselves, but in the sense that they change and grow. They are influenced by not just people, but also places, history and cultural factors. These things influence the way we need to learn a language because, in my humble opinion, you cannot learn a language without taking the culture or history of the language into account. It is obvious that you need to live surrounded by a language in order to learn it. This experience of being involved in a culture allows you to form an emotional bond to the language, and that said, build links to the language. This way you can learn the true use of the language and not just the theory that anyone can get from a textbook. This is why we say that book learning is out of touch with reality.
